

Blind love

That morning as usually an ambitious criminal investigator Rosalie Evans was walking down a foggy London street. The coldness seeped through her slacks and jacket chilling her pale skin. Her hair which she used to have perfectly styled was ruffled by wind . Rosalie was heading to a crime scene and she was to solve another case.

Having arrived there, she found out what had happened. A 58 years old Sam was lying in a pool of blood in the deserted street. A dead body had been found by a blind older woman named Vivian. 'I heard a loud shot from the corner, I ran there quickly not knowing what exactly had happened, then I called for help', she claimed nervously. There had been one more person present - Josh who had been a colleague of murdered Sam had been walking nearby as Rosalie learned later. When interrogating suspects Rosalie found out that Josh had had a huge argument with the murdered colleague that day because Sam had been owing him some money. All the proofs inevitably led to Josh who was detained and was due to be accused of the murder.

However, Rosalie didn't like something about the case. She was going to meet Vivian in a park and ask for more details later that day. From the distance she already saw Vivian standing in the park when something strange happened. Children were playing there, and a ball was about to hit Vivian who crouched promptly in order to protect herself. 'She is not blind!', said Rosalie to herself. After another investigation Rosalie found out Vivian had faked her blindness, as she wouldn't be considered suspicious. 'Sam was love of my life when we were young, but he chose other girl and this was a revenge for that', Vivian admitted. Her confession could finally absolve innocent Josh from blame. 'I will never forget you helped me otherwise I would spend the rest of me life in a jail', said Josh to Rosalie Evans who just smiled contentedly.
